

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Authorship relies on innumerable moments of generosity. I am grateful to Mark Harris for his original inspiration and continued support. Adam Kuper, Henrika Kuklick, Jennifer Platt, John Barnes, Peter Worsley, Jonathan Spencer and David Parkin have all offered invaluable comments and criticisms. Raymond Firth was unfailingly helpful and courteous as I started out on this task, and George Stocking offered much-valued encouragement. I would also like to thank all those who agreed to be interviewed, and others who responded to presentations of this work, whether in London, Oxford, Loughborough, Edinburgh or St Andrews. The many anonymous referees commissioned by Gustaaf Houtman, editor of Anthropology Today, were invaluable in helping me tighten up my arguments. None of this would have been possible without the help of a special research fellowship from the Leverhulme Foundation, and a small grant from the British Academy. Special thanks are owed to Sue Donnelly and her team of LSE archivists, and to Sarah Walpole, archivist at the Royal Anthropological Institute, for her support. Deeper intellectual debts are owed to Donald Moore, Wendy James, Richard Fardon, Ken Wilson and Sue Wright. Last, and most important, I thank Louise Hoult.

Sections of several chapters have been published in earlier and/or different versions. In most cases the text has been revised. These include parts of chapter 3, published in A History of Oxford Anthropology, edited by Peter Riviere (see Mills 2007). An earlier version of chapter 5 was published in Empires, Nations and Natives: Anthropology and State-Making, edited by Benoit de L'Estoile, Federico Neiburg and Lydia Sigaud (Mills 2005a see also Mills 2002). A version of chapter 7 was published in Applications of Anthropology, edited by Sarah Pink (Mills 2006). Parts of chapter 4 were published in Anthropology Today (Mills 2003), in an article entitled 'Professionalising or popularising anthropology?' In all cases permission has been sought to republish these sections.